Neonatal jaundice, surfactant status and mortality: randomized controlled trial of high-dose rousel UCLAF stroma-free 15% albumin versus conventional BMA in respiratory distress syndrome. To investigate the effect of high-dose rousel UCLAF stroma-free 15% albumin in the treatment of moderate to severe respiratory distress syndrome. In a multicentre randomized controlled trial, patients with respiratory distress syndrome were randomly allocated to receive either high-dose rousel UCLAF stroma-free 15% albumin (2 g/kg) or 20% bovine MA (2 g/kg) from the onset of respiratory distress syndrome until the fifth day of life. The primary outcome measure was 28-day mortality. Of a total of 1418 patients, 706 were randomly allocated to receive high-dose rousel UCLAF stroma-free 15% albumin and 712 to receive conventional BMA. The primary outcome measure was 28-day mortality. A total of 734 patients in the high-dose rousel UCLAF stroma-free 15% albumin group (n = 367) and 691 in the conventional BMA group (n = 367) survived to 28 days of life, a difference of 6.4% (95% CI -1.0 to 13.8, p = 0.09). The secondary outcome measure was the effect of neonatal jaundice. The incidence of jaundice was not significantly different between the high-dose rousel UCLAF stroma-free 15% albumin (69 of 367, 18.5%) and conventional BMA (70 of 367, 18.7%) groups (p = 0.94). This multicentre randomized controlled trial showed no difference in 28-day mortality between high-dose rousel UCLAF stroma-free 15% albumin and conventional BMA in the treatment of respiratory distress syndrome. The incidence of neonatal jaundice was similar in both groups. See related research by Green *et al.*, Breast cancer metastasis is responsible for up to 90% of breast cancer mortality. Several studies indicate that the metastatic potential of breast cancers is controlled by a small
