Most computers contain one or more microprocessors. (Other components often found in a computer include: memory chips, display devices, disk drives, operating systems (OSs), and occasionally input devices.) A computer system is the hardware of a computer. For a hardware manufacturer to make a computer, they first have to create a computer design. This design may include any of a computer's components. While some components in a design may be required by a design, they may also be optional. The optional components are generally optional in the sense that they may be available at a later date. A computer design would have a date when it was made to make sure that nobody copies the design, which could be considered intellectual property of the manufacturer. For a computer to be manufactured, the design must be reduced to an actual item of hardware. A design may be reduced to an item using any number of methods. It may be first reduced to a full-scale prototype, then by means of a physical model, then by means of a schematic, and then by means of a bill of materials (BOM). When the design is reduced to an item, the design is said to be ready to manufacture. Once the design is ready to
