Thank you for this very thorough review. I love Elements but by the time you get to version 9 or 10 you have to question how much longer it is going to work, and how much longer they will take to fix whatever they change, and whether or not it will stick around. This review has a lot of info, and provides some examples but also some things that seem like unrealistic expectations to make it easy to use. I decided to buy

Elements 2019 and I'm glad I did. I still wish it had more ways for you to easily select and make modified versions of the photos, but I am sure that will be in Elements 2020 or 2021. For now, Photoshop has worked quite well for me.

In addition to the above, you gain more layers with the inclusion of "Brushes" and "Scenes". The latter is actually a separate application that can be used as a stand-alone travelogue creation tool. There are no other stand-alone travelogue tools that are available. Lightroom doesn't have enough features in this regard. You also gain a Camera Calibration panel, which while designed for professional photographers, can be a nifty way to calibrate (and threshold) your images prior to displaying them.

The workflows for organizing and managing your photos continue being excellent. While one will be able to import a huge amount of photos at once with Lightroom 5, it still takes a while to import even "small" amounts, unless you have a fast computer. Once on the inside, your catalog structures are easy to navigate and there is a valuable help feature and "Layout" app that works great. You can add things like Custom web views or even a "Virtual tour" (great for locations). When switching between the various views ("Events", "Artists" or "Vintage", for example) it's quite easy to find relevant information. Overall, I have found Lightroom to work quite well for my purposes, and appears to always be in a big hurry to import the next batch of photographs.
