There are a number of U.S. patents describing methods for treating or preventing Alzheimer's disease and/or other dementia. Other types of dementia include vascular dementia, multi-infarct dementia, dementia associated with Parkinson's disease, and Huntington's disease. One of the most promising approaches to treating and preventing these diseases is to inhibit the production of beta-amyloid peptide. The beta-amyloid peptide (A β) is a 39-43 amino acid peptide, which is one of several peptides that make up amyloid deposits. To distinguish the other peptides found in the deposits, they are referred to as "A β (1-42)", "A β (1-43)" and so on. A β is the normal by-product of metabolism of the beta amyloid precursor protein (APP). The sequence of A β protein varies from the N-terminal part of APP; however, the A β has a similar overall configuration. In neuritic plaques that accumulate in Alzheimer's disease, the A β is deposited in a highly ordered manner into dense aggregates, while in cerebrovascular amyloid deposits it forms large continuous fibers. Although the etiology of Alzheimer's disease is not clear, it is thought that its main pathophysiological feature is deposition of β -amyloid protein into plaques and cerebral vessels. The β -amyloid protein fragments are released from a transmembrane APP molecule or from a soluble APP derivative. Beta-amyloid protein is one of two primary components of plaques that are deposited in the brains of patients with Alzheimer's disease. The other component is the sub-fraction of A β (1-42). The A β (1-42) forms a kind of amyloid fiber. There are some thoughts that the excessive A β (1-42) can be a causative factor of Alzheimer's disease. On the other hand, the A β (1-42) is known to have a neuro-regulatory action. The A β (1-42) acts as a neurotoxin and shows a depressive action on neurones. In addition, the A β (1-42) inhibits the activation of the NMDA type glutamate receptor, which is the receptor sensitive to an anesthetic called MK-801, and the receptor called DARPA. The receptor is found in the dendrites, as well as in the cell body and
