An endoscope is a flexible instrument with a thin elongated tube or sheath having a light and lens system at a distal end. In recent years, endoscopes have found a wide variety of medical applications including industrial medicine, medicine and dentistry. In general, an endoscope sheath comprises a hollow tube with a multiplicity of lumens. An illumination or light fiber extends into the hollow tube to conduct light from a light source to illuminate the distal tip of the endoscope. A fiber optic light conduit can extend from the distal tip to a camera or eyepiece located near the proximal end of the sheath. The distal end of the endoscope is inserted into a body passage, such as a blood vessel or organ, and the proximal end of the endoscope is manipulated by an operator outside of the body. The manipulation of the proximal end causes the distal tip of the endoscope to be deflected into the body passage. Thus, the endoscope provides the means for viewing the interior of the body passage without substantial surgery. For example, there are endoscopes capable of displaying images from the interior of an organ, such as a blood vessel or stomach, in real time. A video image of the organ is displayed on an electronic video monitor. To enhance the appearance of the video image, a colored image filter (hereinafter referred to as the "endoscope filter") is placed in the optical path between the distal end of the endoscope and the video image receptor. The purpose of the endoscope filter is to color the video image to make it more readily visible. An ideal endoscope filter would effectively transmit the light (i.e., the white light) from the distal end to the video image receptor and block the scattered light (i.e., the colored light) from the distal end that would otherwise be captured by the filter. Certain applications, such as industrial medicine, use various liquids and media for medical procedures. For example, a patient's digestive tract can be irrigated with water or another liquid using an endoscope. The endoscope can also be used to inject media into the body, such as a liquid to remove blood or another liquid for diagnosis. These media and liquids pass through the lumens and/or channels of the endoscope sheath. Thus, it is desirable to have an endoscope that can effectively filter media and liquids that pass through the endoscope. An endoscope has been used for industrial medicine by
