Lifemapper is an app that was built to help you recycle the files, folders, and registry. Since it's a freeware, the owner has decided not to ask you to purchase it, or to pay an annual fee, neither to demand any further advertisement when you want to use its features. The executable file is tiny, less than 2Mb, it's compact, and as described on its website, the author, "since there are many of similar apps, none of them could fit all functions that we wanted". The user interface is obviously simple, but this does not prevent you from having full control over the settings you want to change (no hassles with menus and control panels). It's extremely easy to use, and there are many interesting and helpful functions. You can easily identify the desktop, recycle bin, tools, customize toolbars, access the Task Manager, access the Start Menu and much more. The interface is not bloaty at all, but instead it offers a clear representation of the software's functions. You can easily see the shortcuts, buttons and windows in a single window. Looking at the list of saved items, you can switch between Quick Search and Full Search modes, launch different actions, customize the desktop/toolbar, and create an HTML display for your recycle bin. The most important and unique function offered by Lifemapper is the Search tab. A quick search feature is enabled and you can choose to search for any application/file or folder/folder. After launching the app, you can choose the desired location for the search. The search can include the registry or can browse for items or subdirectories. The search is fast, with an ability to run efficiently, although the whole process may take a bit of time (especially when it comes to file and registry searching). If you choose the Search tab on the main window, you can establish input terms and select between either one or more than one terms. Possible improvements The problem with Lifemapper is its inability to find any file via the search, though there's an option of searching for the application/file/folder by clicking on its name in the results, but this feature can
