Always check your results carefully and make edits that you're satisfied with. If you're unhappy with an image, a simple Recolour Image command allows you to fix it very quickly and easily. Seeing the importance of vector graphics in design No matter what the industry, or how much control a designer has over a particular project, he or she must still take into account the limitations of the physical world. Such limitation constraints include the amount of time, the space available to work in, and, for print, the number of impressions of a particular image. Imagine a print billboard advertising for a particular product. It can cover two city blocks; in the US, the amount of space allowed depends on the size of the billboard (for larger signs) and how many times the advertising message is repeated along the side of the building. With a print, or billboard-type design, you need to know how many impressions or views a particular piece of art will have in order to ensure that the number of impressions is appropriate for the design. Similarly, if a web page has an element of animation, think about the number of requests for that page (views) and the number of requests that a webpage can generate if it has to load pages of content, including graphics. The number of requests for that page would have to be factored into the design. These are some of the limitations that affect a designer working in the print and web worlds. The demands of print and web are a lot different than those of desktop publishing and Adobe InDesign. Designing for print Print demands a more focused design because of the limitations of the print surface and the amount of times the same image can be printed. A good general rule of thumb when making a print design is to not repeat an image more than four times. This limits any design's usefulness in the print world. If you're doing a print-only design, remember that you're likely to be limited to a certain amount of printing with the design and the number of times you can print the same image. For example, say you're designing a poster for a company that only prints a dozen posters a year. A good print design can still be used for other purposes such as branding in the company's brochures or other promotional materials. Photographs or illustrations used for print often need to be enlarged or scaled down. Photoshop and other software programs (such as Illustrator and InDesign) allow you to accomplish this for any image you

Hierarchical control of the electronics and optical properties of ZnO nanostructure arrays. A novel approach for the fabrication of hierarchically structured ZnO nanostructure arrays is reported, which involves the use of a mixture of poly(vinyl pyrrolidone) (PVP) and poly-L-lysine (PLL). This technique allows for the independent control of the morphology of the ZnO nanostructures (NSTs) produced by the ZnO nanostructure arrays (NSTAs), and of the densities of the NSTs and NSTAs. It is shown that the ZnO NSTs can be fabricated in the mesoscopic-to-macroscopic transition regime and, consequently, that their properties are strongly affected by their dimensions. The NSTAs produced via this technique exhibit critical dimension lengths of approximately 350 nm. For low PVP concentrations in the PVP-PLL mixture (Global Youth Peace Journalism Institute The Global Youth Peace Journalism Institute (GYPI) is a non-governmental organization based in New York City. Q: pass data from view to controller by using ajax in MVC I use this code: $.post('MyModel/GetMyModelList', function (data) { alert(data); }); in my view to pass the value of textbox to my controller action method. how can i get this value in the controller action method? My controller action method is: public ActionResult GetMyModelList(string catid,int no_of_rad) { Data.Provider.ViewBag.ViewTitle = catid; int x = 0; x = no_of_rad; foreach (var item in Model) { if (x % 10 == 0) x = x / 10; Debug.WriteLine(no_of_rad); } it shows null after rendering the view. A: You need to assign the id of the form to the textbox, or at least look at the value being passed with $_POST $.post('MyModel/GetMyModelList', { id: $('#txtId').val(),... }); Q: Pandas dataframe get the row value if (the value in a second column is) greater than 0 I have a pandas data frame, and i want to extract the row value if the the value in a second column is above 0. import pandas as pd df = pd.DataFrame([['0.033333333', '0.033333333'], ['0.033333334', '0.033333334'], ['0.033333335', '0.033333335'], ['0.033333336', '0.033333336'], ['0.0333333
