Punished For Sex Abuse Story highlights Study found that 7 in 10 former child care workers had been sexually abused by their past employers. Child care centers paying cash were the least likely to provide abuse protections. Six weeks after the release of the disturbing secret service report detailing decades of sexual abuse of minors by government and military employees in the Washington area, the nation's largest operators of day care centers are revealing that they still have had little luck investigating complaints that former teachers and workers there abused children. This is the sum total of what these centers have to say when it comes to complying with child safety requirements: "If a problem is found we will work with the center to correct the problem." "Unless a complaint involves physical abuse such as a bruise or black and blue mark, we do not intervene in day care case referrals or disciplinary actions." "If a complaint involves physical abuse such as a bruise or black and blue mark, we will work with the center to correct the problem." "The safety and health of our children is a top priority at Green Dot. We take this responsibility very seriously. We provide the Department of Social and Health services with all required statistics on employee background checks as well as annual criminal checks of employees and their families (not including domestic partner/girlfriends) and adverse personnel history checks on supervisors and employees." This response is representative of the 9-11 Child Care Federation, the chief trade organization representing some 200 child care centers in the Washington area, and perhaps more globally. The federation represents centers of all sizes, from small private family facilities to those boasting a single room and kitchen, and working for more than 1,000 children a day. As part of an investigation by NBC News, the federation's assistance was sought, and its director was granted access to the number of complaints and discipline issues, if any, at its more than 2,000 centers around the Washington area. Complaints received by child care centers in the greater Washington area fall under the jurisdiction of the D.C. Department of Human Resources, which includes 17,000 centers operating in the region. One quarter of the centers operated by the federation -- all of which are licensed by the D.C. Department of Human Resources -- responded that they had no reported discipline or complaints against their teachers or employees. The federation was able to respond because of a survey of its members. It identifies itself as the nation's largest child care provider, boasting Hormonal imbalance plays a major part in the functional changes that precede menopause. It affects both physical and psychic attributes. Clinical manifestations of the climacteric syndrome are well defined. Their identification with the help of clinical and psychological tests is elementary. Certain treatments are adapted: hormone substitutive therapy in order to eliminate the hormone imbalance, and behavioral therapies for the alleviation of the menopausal symptoms. The establishment of a reliable therapeutic protocol requires a deeper understanding of the role played by psychosocial factors in the incidence and the course of the climacteric syndrome.Q: Combine the files I need to connect the two tables.
