Adobe Photoshop Lightroom Adobe's newest program, called Adobe Photoshop Lightroom, is a significant update in the images editing arena. Instead of just designing individual photo editing tools, Lightroom works more like a photo album than a collection of tools. It organizes your image into sections called `_collections_`, or albums, and it integrates an image browser with a series of editing tools. Figure 18-3: Elements offers most of the same basic features as Photoshop. You can save individual photos as individual files in your collection or create series of single images and then organize them into collections.

For example, if you're creating a family album, you can create one collection called photos from 2004 and add your son's photos to it. You can then create a second collection called photos from 2006 and add your daughter's photos to it. Lightroom's features are similar to those of Elements and Photoshop. It's a raster-based image editing tool that uses a layer-based editing system with multiple layers to support transparency. Lightroom also has many useful features that are enhanced in Photoshop.

out their products aren't a fraud. If they don't get enough signs to keep the FDA at bay, they will be shut down and fined before you know it, and we will get something much more expensive and clearly inferior. (All of this while they are laughing all the way to the bank at the expense of consumers.) Because we are all so obsessed with drama, I'll make another prediction: If you are paying $20 a bottle for a fancy bottled water, you will soon be paying about a dollar a bottle for some water from a company without fancy packaging. And soon the "pennies" will make up a huge part of the price of bottled water. As soon as the bottom falls out of the bottled water industry, that concept will make sense to everyone. As soon as people realize they are paying a ton of money for "fancy" water that's probably just tap water or swimming pool water, just as nasty, and they can get the same quality for a lot less, they will be much more likely to look at the cheaper alternatives. "...the labels help persuade consumers that the water is safe and healthy..." I think that is absolutely right. I think that's the first and only reason. The rest of the claims could be proven or disproven with a simple experiment. Take some tap water. Open a few bottles and put the contents into five clean containers. Fill the rest of the bottles with tap water. Write down what you see. Then open the tap for a while. Taste test and see if the label changed. Some of these bottles will have made the leap to the fancy bottles... due to people's taste and expectations. People will like the taste of these fancy bottles. If they don't, they will drink the tap water that they are putting on the fancy bottles. So the label won't really change anything... People will find their fancy bottle water as they are used to. My guess is that most of the fancy bottles will stay in the fancy bottles category. This is going to affect only very rich people. So rich people might talk about it. It's not going to affect poor people. They will still go to water fountains, sewer systems, washing water tanks, etc. If some company can sell the water to an affluent customer, it's got them. So the market is not what they want. This is not something that will hit the poor until it hits them. The poor will
