On an unrelated note, Adobe is reportedly in talks with Kodak to make a deal happen. Perhaps, if that goes through, we'll see an official release of a free, full-blown version of Photoshop designed for photographers. Surprise. The news may be old but a deal has been struck between Adobe and Kodak. Not only will all the products mentioned above run on Windows 7, but there may also be a version of Photoshop available on all platforms. The new version of Adobe Capture One will come with some new features. Included are the ability to work with raw files, noise reduction, dust and scratch removal, and chained RAW processing. It is to be noted that while Adobe has shown great interest in some of the third party suggestions, there are no plans to implement them in this software. The new Take One Capture One service is to be launched very soon. The new feature is to help the users as well as the Photographers to have fast results, take quick snapshots, and post them online. The new service is a great way of improving the workflow and making more users more familiar with this new software. Also very recently, Adobe has announced that all the new features and functions that were introduced in Lightroom 5 will be coming to the Lightroom 6. I have actually been using Lightroom 6 and even though this is a very good piece of software, yet not suitable for a new user, I noticed that a lot of new features have been incorporated in this new version. This is definitely a good News for the users of Lightroom. Now, it will be easier to combine the features and work efficiently.
